Mental Health Services

Mental health challenges can sometimes get in the way of everyday functioning, but outpatient services can help people better cope with symptoms. They can meet with a therapist one-on-one or in a group. Education and medication could also be a part of services.

Drug, Alcohol & Addiction Recovery

People struggling with drugs, alcohol, or other addictions can learn new ways to recover. Outpatient services include counseling, education, Medication-Assisted Treatment (MAT) and links to community services.

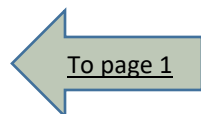

Addiction affects the whole family, so services can also help family members.

Peer Support

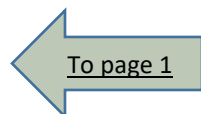

Sometimes it is easier to talk to people who have been through the same things. Peer Support Specialists or “Peers” have done well in recovery and now help others going through the same things, individually or in groups, by phone or in person. They can provide support and connect people to care. Peers may also be family members with familial lived experience.

Other Community Services

People can reach their life goals and be more involved in their communities with community-based services. Support helps people do the things they want such as building better social lives, maintaining employment, or working on life skills. Services are provided where people are most comfortable at their homes or in the community.
